Advance in VLSI technology has led to the emergence of on-Chip Systems (SoC), where a complete system with a large number of intellectual property cores can be integrated onto a single silicon chip. The performance of SoCs highly depends on the speed and efficiency of their underlying communications subsystems. On-Chip Network (NoC), have been suggested to overcome the scalability problem found in traditional shared-bus communication architectures. Intensive research studies are conducted in an attempt to find the optimal networks in terms of performance and cost such as power consumption, and silicon area.

This special issue of International Journal of Computing and Digital Systems (IJCDs) published selected papers from the 2014 International Workshop on the Design and Performance of Networks on Chip (DPNoC 2014), August 17-20, 2014, Niagara Falls, Ontario, Canada. The international workshop DPNoC'2014 (<http://www.intnoc.org/>) was organized in conjunction with the 9th International Conference on Future Networks and Communications-FNC'2014 (<http://cs-conferences.acadiau.ca/fnc-14/>), Niagara Falls, Ontario, Canada, August 17-20, 2014. This workshop represented an international forum for researchers from both academia and industry to expose the latest trends, research findings, and emerging issues in this area.

Several research papers were submitted to the workshop from several countries across the world, and which were rigorously reviewed by the technical program committee members, six papers were selected to be published in this special issue of the journal.

We would like to take this opportunity to thank all people, authors of the submitted papers, organizers of this event, the technical program committee members, and reviewers, who were behind the success of this event.
